

ABSTRACT

A gift, according to the present invention, includes an enclosure having a base and at least one side and preferably forms a rectangular. The enclosure includes at least one card holding assembly and at least one opening. The opening is sized and shaped to accept at least one receptacle adapted to hold an object such as a flower vial. The card holding assembly facilitates the retention of the card after the gift has been presented such that the recipient will be more likely to retain the card and remember the motivation or message behind the gift. Because of the gift's unique design, the gift is suitable for many occasions in which the well-known plain and common combination of flowers and a card would not be appropriate.